"The article posits that while the virus is serious, our scientific response has been unprecedentedly efficient. Specifically, the rapid identification and sharing of the genetic sequence allowed for the swift development of diagnostic tests within weeks. This level of global collaboration, evidenced by the thousands of open-access papers on PubMed, suggests that the infrastructure for managing modern pandemics is far more robust than it was during the 1918 flu. Ultimately, the high recovery rate—nearly 80% of cases being mild—provides a necessary counter-narrative to the prevailing media alarmism."
